Host: Welcome back to Campus Voices! Today, we have Sarah, a second-year biology student, to talk about her volunteering at the City Animal Shelter. Hi, Sarah!

Sarah: Hi! Thanks for having me.

Host: So, what made you decide to volunteer there? Was it because you love animals?

Sarah: Well, partly, yes. I've always liked animals. But honestly, at first, it was mainly to get community service hours for a scholarship application.

Host: Oh, really? So it wasn't just passion?

Sarah: Not at the beginning. But after a few weeks, it became much more than that. I started to notice how scared some of the rescued dogs and cats were, and I wanted to help them feel safe again.

Host: That sounds meaningful. What kind of work do you do there?

Sarah: I help clean the cages, feed the animals, and sometimes assist the staff during check-ups. On weekends, I join adoption events, where people come to meet the animals.

Host: Was it difficult at first?

Sarah: Yes, especially emotionally. Some animals arrive injured or abused. I thought cleaning would be the hardest part, but actually, it was seeing animals that had lost trust in humans.

Host: How did you deal with that?

Sarah: One of the senior volunteers told me to be patient and quiet around them. Over time, some dogs started wagging their tails when I came. That felt really special.

Host: Did volunteering change your perspective in any way?

Sarah: Definitely. I used to think volunteering was just about helping others, but I realized it also changes you. I became more patient and responsible. And I'm even considering studying animal behavior in the future.

Host: Wow! That's quite a change from volunteering just for hours.

Sarah: Yeah, I didn't expect that.

Host: What's the biggest challenge now for you as a student?

Sarah: Time. Balancing assignments, exams, and weekend shifts is tough. I sometimes wake up at 6 a.m. to finish homework before going to the shelter.

Host: That's dedication. Finally, what would you say to students who want to volunteer?

Sarah: Don't do it only for certificates. That motivation won't last long. Go with an open heart, and you might discover something important—about animals and about yourself.

Host: Beautifully said. Thank you, Sarah.

Sarah: Thanks for having me!

Several others were injured in the crash that happened after midnight local time on the highway to Gulu, a major city in northern Uganda.

Two bus drivers going in opposite directions attempted to overtake other vehicles and collided near the town of Kiryandongo, according to police. "In the process, both buses met head-on during the overtaking maneuvers," the police statement said.

In Uganda, 5,144 people were killed in road crashes in 2024. That number rose from 4,806 in 2023 and 4,534 in 2022, according to official police figures, which show a rise in the total number of those killed or injured in road crashes in recent years.

Question 14 Why is Character.AI banning minors from using its chatbots?

Question 15 Which change will be implemented immediately for users under 18?

Question 16 According to the critic Meetali Jain, who can develop emotional dependence due to the platform's design?

News Report 2:

Character.AI, an app that allows users to create customizable characters or interact with those generated by others is banning minors from using its chatbots amid growing concerns about the effects of artificial intelligence conversations on children. The company is facing several lawsuits over child safety, including by the mother of a teenager who says the company's chatbots pushed her teenage son to kill himself.

Character Technologies, the California-based company behind Character.AI, said Wednesday it will be removing the ability of users under 18 to participate in open-ended chats with AI characters. The changes will go into effect by Nov. 25 and a two-hour daily limit will start immediately. Character.AI added that it is working on new features for kids — such as the ability to create videos, stories, and streams with AI characters.

Character.AI said it will be rolling out age-verification functions to help determine which users are under 18. A growing number of tech platforms are turning to age checks to keep children from accessing tools that are not safe for them.

Critics welcomed the move but said it is not enough — and should have been done earlier. Meetali Jain, executive director of the Tech Justice Law Project, said, “There are still a lot of details left open.”

“They have not addressed how they will operationalize age verification, how they will ensure their methods are privacy preserving, nor have they addressed the possible psychological impact of suddenly disabling access to young users, given the emotional dependencies that have been created,” Jain said. “Moreover, these changes do not address the underlying design features that facilitate these emotional dependencies – not just for children, but also for people over the age of 18 years old.”

News Report 3:

This week, Swiss Federal Railways (or SBB) announced plans for a new night train called EuroNight. It will go from Basel in Switzerland to Copenhagen in Denmark and Malmö in Sweden.

A company spokesperson said the new service makes eco-friendly trips to Northern Europe easier for people. It also helps meet the rising need for green travel across borders.

The EuroNight will run three times a week in both directions. The first trip is set to start on April 15, 2026. The train will cover about 1,400 kilometers and carry around 350 passengers. Tickets for the service will go on sale from November 4, 2025.

Night trains are quickly becoming a favorite way to travel in Europe. But high running costs are slowing down their growth. Recently, Austria's rail company ÖBB said it will stop its night trains from Paris to Vienna and Berlin starting in mid-December, following the French government's withdrawal of funding.

The plan for this new sleeper train from Switzerland to Sweden is not final yet. The rail company is waiting for government money to be approved.

The Swiss government has set aside €50.6 million until 2030 to help international night trains. This is part of the CO2 Act, which aims to cut the country's emissions in half over the next five years. But parliament still needs to approve it in the winter session.

If the money is not approved, SBB says it will inform customers and refund any tickets that have already been booked.

Question 21. According to the philosopher Aristotle, what is the highest form of friendship?

Question 22. Why were close friendships especially important for women in the past?

Question 23. What is one key difference between best friends and regular friends?

Question 24. According to the passage, why do people tend to invest more in a few close friends?

Question 25. According to Krems, why do people often hide their friendship rankings?

Although the term “best friend” only became widely used in the 20th century, the idea has existed since ancient times. The famous philosopher Aristotle described three kinds of friendship: those based on pleasure, on usefulness, and on virtue. Friendships of virtue were considered the highest form. These relationships are not just enjoyable or practical — they are stronger and last longer because each person tries to help the other become a better person.

Best friendships were especially important for women in the past, says Jaimie Arona Krems, an associate professor of psychology and director of the UCLA Center for Friendship Research. Historically, when women married, they often left their own homes and communities to live with their husbands’ families. Without their own relatives nearby, friends — especially best friends — became essential sources of support. Today, many young adults move away from their hometowns for school or work, so friends often take on roles similar to family.

In studies, people describe friends with words like trustworthy, honest, supportive, loyal, reliable, kind, pleasant, available, positive, open, understanding, and fun. Best friends share all of these qualities, but more deeply. Krems explains: “There’s more trust, more openness, more understanding, more emotional closeness, a stronger feeling of shared reality.” You can also have more than one best friend, depending on the situation — such as a best friend from childhood, from work, or from the gym.

Whether a spouse should be considered a best friend is often debated. In Krems’s research, many people do not list their romantic partner or family member as their best friend, even though they say they want their partner to be one.

Whether a spouse should be considered a best friend is often debated. In Krems's research, many people do not list their romantic partner or family member as their best friend, even though they say they want their partner to be one.

Calling someone a "best friend" also means admitting that other friends are less close. This may sound cold, but researchers say people naturally rank their relationships. One theory, suggested by British evolutionary psychologist Robin Dunbar, says humans can only maintain about 150 social connections — known as Dunbar's number. These people are placed into different layers, from the closest friends in the inner circle to people you might only recognize on the street. Because our time and emotional energy are limited, we can't stay close to everyone we know. So, we are more likely to invest in the friends we have already spent a lot of time with — usually the three to five people in our closest circle.

This ranking system can sometimes become uncomfortable or obvious in public. For example, at weddings, one person is chosen as the best man or maid of honor. This can surprise others because people often hide their friendship rankings, Krems explains, to "make several people believe they are our best friend."

We like to think that we reach conclusions by reviewing facts, weighing evidence and analyzing arguments. But this is not how humans usually operate, particularly when decisions are important or need to be made quickly. What we usually do is arrive at a conclusion (26) K of conscious reasoning and then, and only if required, search for reasons as to why we might be (27) I.

The first process, drawing a conclusion from evidence or facts, is called inferring; the second process, searching for reasons as to why we might believe something to be true, is called rationalizing.

That we rationalize more than we infer seems counter-intuitive, or at least (28) A, to a species that prides itself on its ability to reason, but it is supported by the work of many researchers. We tend to prefer conclusions that are (29) M with our existing world-view, and that don't require us to (30) D a pleasant and familiar narrative. We are also more inclined to accept these conclusions, and to (31) G those that require us to seriously examine existing beliefs.

A. uncomfortable	B. transfer	C. association	D. change	E. reach
F. substitution	G. resist	H. naturally	I. right	J. follow
K. independently	L. create	M. consistent	N. difference	O. anxious

There are many ways in which our brains help us to do this. Is global warming too difficult to understand? Your brain makes a (32) F for you: what do you think of environmentalists? It can then (33) B that impression, positive or negative, to the issue of global warming and presents a conclusion to you in sync with your existing views.

Your brain also helps to make sense of situations in which it has minimal data to work with by creating a close (34) C between pieces of information. If we hear the words “refugee” and “welfare” together, we cannot help but weave a narrative that makes some sort of coherent story. The more we hear this, the more familiar and ingrained the narrative.

Now, if you are a politician or a political advisor, knowing this sort of thing can give you a powerful tool. It is easier to help people rationalize than it is to ask them to infer. More plainly, it is easier to lay down a path for people to (35) J than it is to allow them to find their own. Happily for politicians, this is what our brains like doing.
